I am deeply grateful for the opportunity to attend and present at the 4th Single Domain Antibody Conference, held from September 29 to October 1, 2025, at the Jaarbeurs in Utrecht, the Netherlands. Supported by the travel grant, I was able to deliver an oral presentation on my PhD project, which proved to be an immensely rewarding experience. The talk was well received, and I was encouraged by the constructive feedback from both academic researchers and industry experts.

Following my presentation, several participants approached me with thoughtful questions, ranging from ways to improve their own methods to suggestions that could strengthen and extend my approaches. These discussions not only helped me reflect critically on my work but also opened new perspectives on how my methods might evolve in the future. Representatives from industry research teams also expressed interest in the potential applications of my project and inquired about my plans for the next steps after establishing these methodologies.

Beyond the scientific sessions, the conference was an excellent opportunity to expand my professional network. I reconnected with old collaborators and formed new friendships with peers who share similar research interests. These interactions reinforced the collaborative spirit of the field and inspired new ideas for future partnerships.

The setting of Utrecht itself added to the experience. The city's welcoming atmosphere and charm provided the perfect backdrop for both academic exchange and personal connection. Overall, attending this conference was highly valuable for my professional growth and future research.
